Crimson Letters

An interactive story Chapter One

The rain had not stopped for three days. She found the letter tucked beneath the door of the studio: thick cream paper, no return address, and a single line of red ink that made her pulse skip.

"I saw you through the window. You were perfect."

Outside, the city glowed in shades of neon and smoke. She read the line again, then a third time, and felt the strange warmth of being watched.

Chapter Two

The invitation

The address led to a members-only lounge on the twelfth floor. Velvet walls. Low light. A woman in a black dress who knew her name before she said it.

"You came," she said. "I hoped you would."

Every door in the room was closed. Every eye was on her. She should have turned around. She didn’t.

Chapter Three

To be continued for members

This is a demo document included with the local preview build of JERRYHUB.

In production, stories are uploaded as private PDFs and served through short-lived signed URLs after your Patreon membership is verified.

Unlock the full library at jerryhub.app